The human body is a complex and amazing assembly of living matter. However, any arm, leg, or digit that breaks, is often a serious and irreparable obstacle to human and animal life. For centuries, people have been trying to build new limbs. The current paradigm is through tissue and autogenous (self) limb transplantation. Unfortunately, a highly invasive procedure has a high rate of complications and is not cost effective. In recent years, artificial limbs have been increasingly developed to improve function and quality of life. Despite some progress, these artificial limbs are not yet completely functional replacements for whole limbs. Researchers and engineers have been developing new technological platforms to enhance the limb replacement process. Additive manufacturing, also known as 3D printing, offers a new approach for the construction of prostheses, customized for the individual patient. The technology offers the possibility to create highly precise anatomically accurate implants in close relationship to living tissues, with a precise fit for each patient. This is possible due to highly sophisticated precision implant manufacturing machinery – in the same way that cars can be engineered. The term additive manufacturing was coined in 1981, when a group of print engineers at Xerox had the idea of printing a small part by laying down layer after layer of a material, until it is ready
