Field of the Invention The present invention relates generally to the field of communications, and more specifically to the timing of communications involving a motion picture. B. Description of Related Art As described in this section, the following references provide information related to various aspects of the present invention. In a digital video environment, such as a High Definition Television (HDTV) or Advanced Television Systems Committee (ATSC) compliant environment, random access points, such as those provided in MPEG-2 Transport Streams, typically involve delivering asynchronous user-data frames to a digital video device in a single stream that can be parsed out by the digital video device for reading and processing. Each user-data frame may include a Presentation Time Stamp (PTS) associated with the time the frame was transmitted to the digital video device. However, there are no frame timing or PTS clock references for other transport streams, such as incoming data packets for a motion picture. Conventional MPEG-2 transport streams also include a stream header, a PES header and a Program Clock Reference (PCR), which can be used to synchronize and time-stamp an incoming transport stream. A first PCR, known as a Program Clock Recovery (PCR) or PCR timing, can be used to detect the beginning of a transport stream based on PCR values, as can be seen in a transport stream to be within a specified range. When such a stream is parsed out, for example, an image frame, the arrival time of the transport stream will be near, but not at, the beginning of the transport stream. As described in some embodiments of U.S. Pat. No. 6,567,067, a transmitter of a digital video signal includes a transmission buffer to send a transport stream of MPEG frames to a digital video device. The digital video device includes an FEC control to detect a PCR 50b96ab0b6

There are other settings that are generic across the company's devices - hopefully that will be more useful to you. As an example, you can download a factory reset image of the Tab A8 and get an original factory setup out of it. However, if you restore the same image onto a new device, you'd be installing a "factory fresh" image just like you expect a new Tab A8 to have. You can use Fusestorage to download factory images of all of the Tab A8 devices in the Lenovo lineup, or you can download the OS image (whatever is on the Tab A8's fastboot menu) and flash it onto the device's own flash. I don't know whether Lenovo provides factory images of the Tab A8 OS in any of their online documentation, but it's an option if you want to go that route, though you'd need the Tab A8's fastboot binary to do that. You can use USB Debugging to install an app onto the Tab A8 on the computer. You'll need root access if you use that (you probably need it regardless of how you acquire that device), but you can use USB Debugging to install a factory reset image onto a Tab A8 (or any other device, but it's easy) if you're having an issue with your own device (e.g., if you don't want to take it to a Lenovo Service Center). That's all a bit cumbersome if you want to get an image onto the device, but that's what it takes to have the device act like a stock device and so that you can build an image for it that's likely to work (and get updates from Lenovo for the device when they get released). You can also use the provided software
