Today, the company unveiled the plan for its biggest-ever test drive - namely, that it will enter a zero-emissions vehicle with hydrogen fuel cell technology into the race to electrify. To be clear, the actual car - the Vulcan - will only be driven on public roads, not down the M4 or around the Nurburgring. It will be used in the company's "Hydrogen and Fuel Cell Technology Car Trials" - a program the company has been running in secret for the last two years, with the goal of eventually producing a road-going electric car built around the technology. But Aston Martin is clear that it needs to start somewhere - and considering the automotive and petroleum industries see zero-emission vehicles as a significant breakthrough, it's one worth starting on. The vehicle will have a "Hydrogen-powered propulsion system and zero emissions," according to Aston Martin, with the company using its VH architecture - the company's modular platform also being used in the upcoming Speedtail concept - to scale up the batteries and cells necessary for a car of this size. To make the Vulcan, Aston Martin will partner with a Canadian hydrogen fuel cell startup called Hydrogenics. The cars will be built using a Hydrogenics production line in Ontario. "The company is currently researching the hydrogen technologies necessary for mass production," said a company spokesperson. "The technology is highly scalable and it is envisaged the fuel cell would fit within the current design, but additional research would be required to achieve this
