Preliminary studies have revealed a multiple qualitative and quantitative abnormalities of phospholipids in the malignant CLL cells. The specific aims of this proposal are to: 1) characterize the altered membrane lipid composition; 2) assess their possible role as markers of prognosis and progression; and 3) extend the scope of analysis to include a wider spectrum of other lipid classes. This aim will be accomplished by the generation, isolation and subsequent characterization of normal and malignant cell plasma membranes. This will be done by extensive lipid extraction, thin layer chromatographic analysis. The second aim is to evaluate the role of the altered lipid in leukaemic cell growth and differentiation, and the third aim is to determine the presence of other membrane lipid classes, viz glycosphingolipids, sphingomyelin, and cholesterol, by preparative thin-layer chromatography. The diagnostic and prognostic potential of the chemical changes noted in the CLL cells will be evaluated in the laboratory and in clinical studies. The present studies will be a first step in our long term objective of 1) establishing a detailed biochemical definition of CLL, and 2) attempting to relate these properties to the clinical status and prognosis of the patient. [Treatment of acute hepatic abscess using percutaneous drainage]. A review of 66 patients with acute hepatic abscess was conducted to evaluate the efficacy of percutaneous abscess drainage in treating acute hepatic abscess (AHAs). The results showed that most of the patients are misdiagnosed and HAs should be borne in mind in the differential diagnosis of abdominal pain. The diagnosis of HAs was highly consistent with clinical signs, computer tomography (CT) and ultrasonography. Patients with chronic liver disease were excluded from the study. Fifty-five patients received first time treatment by percutaneous abscess drainage and antibiotic therapy. The infection was cured in all cases. The successful rate was 73.6%. Only one patient experienced recurrence and died. Percutaneous abscess drainage is effective in treatment of some HAs.Preparation and in vitro evaluation of a novel oral heparinoid-like polysaccharide from fruits of the Morinda elliptica. A heparinoid polysaccharide (PEPS) was obtained from fruits of the Morinda elliptica (Rubiaceae). PEPS had an average molecular weight of 78 kDa and contained a backbone of  $\rightarrow 4$ )- $\alpha$ -D-Glcp 6d1f23a050
