Each individual bone is made up of numerous discrete parts. Together these parts allow for an array of different motions with respect to one another. To allow for such motion, these discrete bones and their discrete parts are held together with various types of tissues and other features, including muscles, nerves, ligaments, and other types of tissues. In many applications, the process of assembling these various parts of the body for the purpose of allowing them to function as an integrated unit can be difficult. Such difficulties can be exacerbated if, for example, the various parts that are to be assembled have a small size, are difficult to access, and/or are being held in place in a dynamic environment..99" width="480">
