By Claude Boille RESEARCH into how humans are acting as over-users of Earth's ecosystem is generating more debate about whether such limits exist. In the ocean, there are parallels. Not enough water runs through that vast system to meet everyone's needs, and there are large supplies of fresh water left unused. The hope of many futurists is that this imbalance will be resolved in the water's favour as people turn to using it for farming, and the surplus water is returned to the oceans. But they may be worried about how to do this while keeping the planet's oceans healthy.The present invention relates to improvements in or relating to apparatus for color separation of images. It is well known to obtain color separation of an image by operating an image recording apparatus, such as a color copying machine or a color facsimile machine, to produce multiple color separation images corresponding to the original image. The color separation images are transferred to different recording papers which are stacked on a paper discharge tray or paper discharge trays. It is also well known to arrange an optical unit in a copying machine for subjecting the image to a color separation processing, and to position the paper in the
