The overall goal of this Phase I project is to develop a practical and efficient system for collecting over-the-counter biologic specimens (previously referred to as "latent epidemiologic samples" by the CDC) for the analysis of harmful chemicals in a public school-based health survey for approximately 7800 12-year-old girls. The proposed new sample-collection system (a) would be highly attractive to the girls because it would be a fun project; (b) would use a new health-related technology, and (c) would save the girls from highly uncomfortable sampling. Girls who are about to enter grades 4, 5 and 6 of a large public school district in the southwest USA will be asked to complete a questionnaire and to provide a saliva sample which will be used to assess the students' arsenic and fluoride levels. A saliva sample will be collected for analysis for the subsequent 5 years. The samples are being collected as part of a child health project in the field of environmental health. The proposed project will develop a prototype to test the feasibility of our approach, as well as our ability to consistently collect the samples, analyze them, and return the samples and the test results. The project team includes David Chang, Dr. John, G. Rudolph, Dr. Dale Lloyd, and Dr. Bruce Lanphear. Our most important objective will be to develop a reliable and valid data base for a large cohort of 12-year-old girls. The specific aims of the project are to demonstrate that (1) the saliva collection system is highly acceptable to the girls, (2) the saliva samples can be consistently collected, (3) the saliva samples can be analyzed for key toxicants, and (4) the saliva test results can be returned on a reliable basis. The present invention relates to a process for producing a slurry comprising sludge and limestone slurry (limestone pulp) and the uses thereof. In industrial processes, in order to dispose of industrial waste and other wastes, it is necessary to separate and handle the wastes according to given directives. Furthermore, in order to avoid environmental contamination, the material used as a raw material in the production of the industrial wastes is often reusable, and the separation and handling of the waste is often a matter of recycling
