WindowsÂ Programming NetBus.Bacterial community structure and organic matter degradation in the subsurface of an intensive phosphate-mining area. Soil samples from the subsurface of a phosphate mine in southern Brazil were analyzed to examine the microbial community structure and evaluate their capacity to degrade organic matter. A clear correlation was observed between the abundance of sulfate-reducing (SRB) genera and the degree of organic matter degradation. Sulfate-reducing bacteria belonging to the family Desulfobacteriaceae dominated the microbial community, being the predominant group (up to 40% relative abundance), and were related with the mineralization of organic carbon at a distance of 5 m from the mine. In addition, sulfate-reducing bacteria responsible for anaerobic oxidation of organic sulfides and ammonium removal were detected at distances of 3 and 15 m, but in lower abundance (13 and 9%, respectively). Nitrite-oxidizing bacteria were not detected in the soil from the study area, which may be related to a lack of ammonium in the sample. These results indicate that the dominant SRB
