The effect of trace metal exposure on physiological and pathological effects has not been thoroughly investigated in fish. This study describes the pathophysiological effects caused by copper exposure in mummichog (Fundulus heteroclitus) and American eel (Anguilla rostrata). Data on copper accumulation within the tissues (e.g., gills, skin, muscle, and liver), lung, kidney, and blood, as well as a number of physiological markers of copper toxicity were collected from copper-exposed fish. These data were compared to parallel data collected from reference fish. Fish were exposed to waterborne copper at 1.0 microg/L
