On February 12 2013 by jonathan.An online petition has been launched in the hopes of stopping the highest paid man at Microsoft from turning his millions into a reality. Wayne Ernest, a former HR Director for the software giant, has had a board game made which features a high-tech grey disc that takes the place of the randomised virtual dice game of his board game, Dice Towers. Ernest started working at Microsoft in 1995 as a software engineer, and became a director for MSN in 2007. The petition, created by a man called Derek Atkinson, says: "I am writing to you because I am VERY shocked to find out that your company has allowed Wayne Ernest, Microsoft's highly paid, highly decorated director to patent an in-game feature of a board game, using Microsoft's brand and intellectual property. "From what I've been able to gather, Dice Towers is essentially a very high tech, very random game of dice. The game's host, Wayne Ernest, uses Microsoft products, such as Excel to generate random numbers in a certain way that the player can then use to determine which dice will land on which number on the board. "This in-game feature of the game is essentially a way for the host to control the outcome of the game by controlling how the dice are rolled." As you can see, the feature is called, "dice karaoke" (emphasis theirs). Derek Atkinson, the creator of the petition, also has a number of other grievances with Ernest's management, such as the fact that he flew to Thailand, and was given a $17,000 per-diem. A Microsoft spokesperson says the company has nothing to do with the game, though one of the petition's sign c6a93da74d
