The auditory nerve can be electrically stimulated either by implanting electrodes at the round window or directly at the nerve root. Electrodes have been used in various forms including concentric ring and cuff electrodes and subperineural electrodes. Numerous papers on clinical applications of this method have been published. Various approaches to optimal stimulus parameters have been reported, including post-electrotomy measurements of auditory nerve action potentials. The post-electrotomy approach has provided important information on effects of electrode location. The method provides a means for assessing the effects of lesions in the auditory nerve and in the brainstem. The method requires little more than electrodes and a reference. The electrodes can be arranged in many configurations allowing for the study of physiological properties of the nerve. Although testing of the auditory nerve has been accepted as a valid laboratory method, some concerns exist regarding the patient tolerance of the procedure, and there is some evidence that the nerve may be damaged during the procedure. Recent developments in neural stimulation should broaden the potential applications of this method. Comparison of live and stationary cultures of staphylococci using the method of doubled-grid technique. Comparative studies on the sensitivity to antibiotics of bacteria grown in stationary and in live, nutrient-medium cultures were performed. The doubling times of cells grown in the stationary cultures were longer than those of cells grown in the live ones. The same antibiotic concentrations that inhibited the growth of the live bacteria inhibited the growth of the bacteria in the stationary cultures of the same staphylococcal species. However, the latter were sometimes less sensitive to the antibiotic than were the live bacteria. The influence of the medium on the sensitivity of staphylococci to the antibiotics was not revealed. Green Park, Dublin Green Park is one of the largest residential areas of Dublin, Ireland, located in the inner city. It lies about 0.5 miles from the historical centre of Dublin, in the north of South Dublin. It is bounded on the north by Aston Quay, on the east by the Grand Canal, on the south by Glasnevin Cemetery and on the west by Fairview Gardens. It has been known by various names over the years. In the 19th century, from the beginning of the 19th century, it was known as Greenfield, but it was renamed when the c6a93da74d
