Beginning with a working operating system, the course focuses on the study of the most fundamental, core techniques of software development. Operating systems for some time have been seen by a large segment of the computing community as the linchpin for future advances in computer science. The course will cover the theoretical and practical foundations of operating systems, as well as describe the history of operating systems. Our desire for an operating system that is small enough to fit into our memory will be explained. The course will also be a thorough introduction to the high-level languages in which operating system software is written. This course will be an in-depth study of operating system concepts as they apply to a large, but practical implementation on a Unix based system. Tools and techniques for writing and debugging operating system software will be introduced, and a second application will be developed. Finally, the course will cover distributed systems, a topic for which operating systems have been a prominent example for almost three decades. The course will be a mixture of lecture, laboratory, and seminar formats.

DEA Gives Charter Operator License to Grow Cannabis Debbie LaTour is a former government affairs operative who now helps marijuana companies navigate the regulatory miasma that envelops them.

She points out that with the DEA now based in Southwest DC, there is a lot more day-to-day chatter happening there than there was when D.C. was home to a federal law enforcement agency.

She said, "I think it's a positive, because everyone knows everyone. So there's just more relationships built. You see your friends up and down the hall," she said. The DEA asked about the location of the new facility, and they said they were working with city planners and consultants on the Environmental Impact Statement as well as with the Department of Health to sort out where the facility should be and how that location will impact the surrounding neighborhoods. Charter was chosen over other applicants because Charter was the only company that was willing to provide a large quantity of cannabis. Charter said they also wanted to work with local tenants to make sure they all had the space they needed for cultivation and distribution. Charter is the first company to receive a charter under the new program. Others have only applied and not yet received approval. The five companies chosen so far will be given licenses to cultivate and distribute weed, and the federal government will be in charge of setting up cultivation centers and transportation hubs so the cannabis can be transported between them. Charter will receive a license to grow from the city government and will operate the Department of Health's cultivation center until further notice. Charter also has an agreement with Moncure Holdings to open dispensaries and they plan to open their first one on April 4th. The company is planning to hire all the workers needed to operate the facility and will have local vendors who provide delivery and transportation services. Charter is planning to work with industry groups, such as the Recreational Consumer Council, to help educate and inform the public about the product as well as help educate workers about the ins and outs of the cannabis industry. Charter will not be the only major employer in the city. The area is already home to more than half of the capital's residents, and more than 5,500 construction workers are working in the area, according to a Local Call news report. The DEA issued 22 licenses for five companies to grow and distribute marijuana on August 24th. They asked for 250,000 ounces of marijuana each, a small chunk compared to the Oregon and Michigan licenses that are being approved. The federal government is giving the licenses to these five companies because there is not enough pot for everyone in the DC area. Charter is providing the product that is not being generated by the legalization of weed in Michigan and Oregon. The other four licensees are working under a lottery system, and they are all winning the random drawing for the licenses. Washington will be the 13th state to legalize cannabis, and it will become the largest city with a legal weed market.
