from a counseling perspective, perhaps the most remarkable piece of research concerning pornography among teenagers is a 1998 report by Kinsey. That report surveyed the literature and the results of a survey it conducted, asking members of more than two dozen different religious groups in the U.S. about their beliefs on the effects of pornography on teenagers. About two-thirds of the subjects agreed that pornography led to sexual acting out or behavior, and that it was harmful. only 2 percent disagreed. many subjects believed that pornography led to unintended pregnancy or sexually transmitted diseases, that it was (or could be) addictive, or that it was acceptable for teenagers to use. only 4 percent disagreed with any of these. these findings confirm a claim made earlier by kinsey: that the way that many evangelicals think about pornography reflects a lifelong, deep ambivalence about sexuality itself. the subjects in the 1998 survey were not necessarily representative of the country as a whole, but it seems possible that the findings will be repeated across cultures, and will gain new meaning in light of present developments. some of the points made above may seem to show that the effects of pornography, like those of television, differ from culture to culture. however, these differences may be superficial. one of the remarkable lessons of the kinsey report is that all of the significant differences in subject responses center around a single issue: is it allowed? the subjects had very little in common with regard to other matters. this finding suggests that an unbiased look at the effects of pornography, whatever they may be, may find evidence of population-wide differences in more than the just the context of its use.

teenagers who spend more time on television and online are more likely to be worried about the consequences of sexting than are their less-exposed peers. “sexist messages” are more common in television and online texts among teens with higher exposure to media (such as more hours spent watching television) relative to teens with lower exposure. teens with more television exposure were more likely to have been concerned about sexually explicit online messages and to have been subject to sexist messages. the relationship between exposure and sexist messages decreased for some teens over time, suggesting that repeated exposure to sexist messages may alter perceptions of self and others. specifically, by the third time they viewed sexist online messages, gender relations became more negative and teens' overall self-esteem became lower. the ability to carry out our behavior is also important. again using the national campaign's (2008) survey, the results showed that a majority of teens who had sexually exchanged text messages in the past (or used such content in their cell phone or laptop) said that they had also felt free to do the same in real life. teens who had acted on sexual role plays on the internet were also more likely to say they had done so in real life. in turn, the ability to carry out sexual behavior online may depend on what models are available. internet-savvy teenagers may use their skills to simulate sexual partners online. others may prefer more traditional approaches to role playing in real life. yet other teens may find it difficult to achieve the variety of sexual partners they would like. faced with such constraints, they may turn to virtual environments, which allow for wide variation in sexual partners. 5ec8ef588b
