additionally, the xbox 360 will be able to use a usb pendrive that will store the system files and the original hard drive, only in the event of a total system failure. this is why you should format the drive yourself when using it and ensuring that is formatted fatx. if the disk does not hold the fatx system, it will default to the standard ntfs file system. if the drive will not hold a fatx file system, you may find that some of your titles may not work. only format it to fatx if it will hold a fatx file system. the fatx support is what the xbox 360 truly needs, and it should be among the first priorities of the xbox one and any future xbox hardware. unfortunately, since fatx was never intended for consumer devices it will likely never be supported on the xbox 360. xex found information on their site for the achievement h8, and it says you can either: first buy the gm unit, and then sell it for more when you want to. build from an older rgh, and then sell it build using the new ue falcon rgh unit this isnt exactly how that works, but i assume you get an xbox motherboard, clone the ram onto the motherboard, then clone the cpu onto the ram. but its always best to get a gx controller to use with xex all of this requires a uef falcon motherboard, and a gx controller. stealth servers/hackers might ban your gx or steal your kvbin by getting to see your serial number, or by not getting your cpu key if you put your cpukeybin along with your kv.bin, they mightnt ban it at all. i have lots of different cpu keys, but i have no idea what or how much it costs for them.

backup your saves when flashing through the use of an rgh/jtag. this will save all of your save files in case anything goes wrong. if you don't have an rgh/jtag, you can use a flash drive or a standard usb port (you would have to open your console's case to do this). although there is the possibility of losing all your saves, it would be safer if you back them up. 5ec8ef588b
