As we move into the final part of our Adobe Photoshop review, I would like to talk about two closely related but unique features - the external content editor and the Collage tool. The issue is that these two tools, when switched on, are always working, and they try to adjust our images to suit whatever they are doing. Photoshop also does a great job on the iPad. Like other iPad apps, the display remains locked to the iPad also. Occasionally, depending on how large a file and complexity of an image, Photoshop would stutter and get stuck. It's not critical, because it's possible to edit on the iPad, but it's still an annoyance. There is one, fairly big, problem you will encounter if you use Photoshop on the iPad: There is an app called Pixelmator that is also available for both iPad and iPhone, and is MUCH better than Photoshop in most cases. If pixel scaling is an issue, or you want the best possible quality production for complex images, you really should use Pixelmator. It costs, but is worth it. I've used it for 14 years, so I've seen a lot of software come and go. It's a "classic" experience that could have been done 1000x better. Adobe is getting better with its Photoshop apps on Android, but it will be interesting to see what evolution its products will bring in the years to come. For now, you can give it a try for free.

Disclosure: I am the developer/owner of GetApp and I have a financial connection with Apple, just like anyone else who makes/owns an Apple product.
