Community Center in Oregon, a state law enforcement official and a law enforcement official briefed on the case said. Police have not publicly identified the dead or their relationship to the facility. Officials are investigating a possible shootout, although they said they believe that no bombs were found at the scene. An official briefed on the investigation said Friday that police have not determined the motive behind the shooting. Investigators received a tip about a shooting at a Jewish Community Center in the town of Roseburg in rural Douglas County, about 90 miles northwest of Portland. Douglas County Undersheriff Kevin Joyce said, "We received information that there was a reported shooting at a Jewish community center, and there was a report that somebody went into the school." "The Oregon State Police, officers from the state, entered the premises to search it for explosive devices," he said. He added that about 50 people were inside the center during the shooting and that there was no threat to the surrounding community. "In the event that we had a bomb, it was a nuisance device and not a device that could hurt anybody," he said. The Oregonian newspaper reported that a Douglas County law enforcement official said there was "one report of shots fired" but "no reported injuries." "There was no threat to the public," the official told the newspaper. A spokeswoman for the Jewish Community Center of the Pacific Northwest said the center was holding a "day of solidarity and mourning for the recent violence toward Jews and to promote an atmosphere of love 04aeff104c
