Résumé : The good news is that you don't need to follow any software package to do your own home theatre setup, and you can start right now. The bad news, though, is that, to get into the big leagues, you might want to invest in some hefty hardware. In this article, we are going to tackle both the setup and the performance of a Windows-based home theatre system. Hardware There are different options when it comes to choosing an audio player that will allow you to enjoy digital media. Of course, your first option will be something you already have in your home. But if you don't have any digital-based audio devices (like a DAW or media streaming platform) at the moment, your next options are either a dedicated audio player, or a home theatre PC. The good news is that even if you end up buying a separate audio system, you will not need anything special to play digital media. Your HDTV, Blu-ray player, or other media centre unit should already be capable of playing audio. What you need to do is connect it to your home theatre system and start enjoying. This will usually be as simple as hooking up the HDMI cable. To be able to do this, you need to have a computer that has HDMI out port, so you can connect your Blu-ray player, to your home theatre system. In most cases, you need to go for a computer that is already running Windows, although you could also get an extra version of Windows on a USB key to install it, if you only want to play Blu-ray movies. Home theatre PCs Home theatre PCs are specially designed PCs that are meant to be used as a home theatre system. These PCs come with dedicated graphics cards that are very powerful, and they are usually built for all the other capabilities they have. They include everything from built-in digital video cards, to surround-sound systems, and even add-on video cards for extra gaming capabilities. The best home theatre PC systems come with a GPU that is powerful enough to run top video games, and they usually have a sound system that is built-in. In some cases, these systems even have 4K video cards to enable 4K resolution playback, but these are very expensive. If you do decide to go for a home theatre PC, you should know that you will need a dedicated HDMI video card for connecting it to your TV.

Another feature is the grid you can use to solve for x, y, z. Just click where you want and it will take you to the next calculation. The difference is that you don't have to drag the calculator to the number like you do with a standard calculator. What's more, if you put a wrong number into the calculator, it will tell you that there's an error in the number. You can't type in the wrong thing and get back results.
