Synopsis.Up to now, numerous apparatus have been provided in order to protect the structure of a workpiece from damage due to the machining of the workpiece. For example, a chip removal tool, having a plurality of blades mounted on a rotary head of the tool, is rotated by a motor provided in a chuck of the tool so as to cut chips from the workpiece. Such a type of tool removes chips by creating friction between the workpiece and the blades of the tool. However, the blades do not always cut chips equally spaced from the cutting portion. For example, the higher the rotational speed of the blades, the higher the amount of chips removed. However, the clearance between the tool and the workpiece increases. If the amount of chips cut by the blades is larger than the clearance, then chips fill the gap between the blade and the workpiece. Then, the chips fall from the cutting portion and damage the surface of the workpiece. In order to prevent chips from falling from the cutting portion, it is usual to mount rubber formed by molding a small amount of rubber on the surface of the blade. 79a2804d6b
