Novel mouse model of crescentic glomerulonephritis with autoantibodies to perforin and granzyme B. Previously, we developed a mouse model of crescentic glomerulonephritis resembling the nephritis of human Wegener's granulomatosis (WG). It was hypothesized that perforin-granzymemediated apoptosis was involved in the pathogenesis of this disease. A novel mouse model of crescentic glomerulonephritis with autoantibodies to perforin and granzyme B was developed using the Lewis strain and strain 129 of mice. The glomeruli of the new mouse model showed the characteristic mesangial cell accumulation and crescent formation. The infiltrating cells were predominantly CD4(+) T cells and monocytes/macrophages. While the production of inflammatory cytokines such as tumor necrosis factor-alpha and interferon-gamma was detected in the affected mice, anti-inflammatory cytokines such as transforming growth factor-beta1 were not detected. Transfer of anti-CD3 antibodies into naïve mice induced glomerular infiltration of lymphocytes and crescent formation similar to that observed in the new model. Following transfer of CD4(+) T cells from mice of the new model to naïve mice, a crescentic glomerulonephritis was also induced. These results suggest that lymphocytes, macrophages, and CD4(+) T cells are involved in the pathogenesis of this model of crescentic glomerulonephritis, in which autoantibodies to perforin and granzyme B are essential.
