MOSCOW (Reuters) - Moscow's appeal to the United Nations for help in resolving a two-year stand-off over the construction of a dam on the Dnieper river was sharply criticised on Thursday by Ukraine and Washington. FILE PHOTO: Russian military trucks drive near the dam on the Dnieper river which is built under construction by Russia in the village of Shirokaya, Ukraine, September 16, 2016.

REUTERS/Maxim Shemetov Russia had hoped to build the Dnieper Hydroelectric Power Station near the Russian city of Kryvyi Rih, but Ukraine and the European Union objected to the plan as an infringement on the country's sovereignty. Moscow has insisted that the project is necessary for the development of the region and that it has the right to build on its own territory. "Building such a big project in Ukraine, which is not a member state of the UN, is a violation of international law," Russian UN envoy Vassily Nebenzia told a Security Council meeting. "We believe the world community has enough understanding of the conditions for the building of the project, and if the world community is convinced that this is in the interests of the region, then the issue can be resolved," Nebenzia added. Russia needs the dam, which is 70 percent complete, to provide about 8 percent of Europe's power and is an integral part of Moscow's plans to build a new land corridor from the Black Sea to the Pacific Ocean via Ukraine and Belarus. But the EU has called for the construction of the dam to be suspended. The plan is opposed by Kiev, which argues that it will damage the country's hydrocarbon reserves and its ecological environment. Although the project was publicly announced by then Russian president Vladimir Putin in December 2014, it has not been completed. "What we see is a direct violation of international law," said Ukrainian ambassador Volodymyr Yelchenko, who spoke after Nebenzia. "The Russians are acting as if building a road to the Pacific, which they began in 2014, was just a simple road-building project." EU ambassador to the UN Yves Herman said the EU regretted the delay of the project, but insisted on the fact that the decision to build the dam had been taken by the Russians themselves. "Not a single one of our partners in the European Union of 27 is asking for the exclusion of any project which belongs to Russia within the Russian state's borders," Herman said.
