Chloroquine-resistance in cultured human amastigotes of Trypanosoma rangeli. The growth of cultured parasites from human amastigotes of Trypanosoma rangeli was significantly reduced in the presence of chloroquine at concentrations greater than 100 micrograms/ml. Lysis of the parasites at this concentration may be due to the toxic effect of chloroquine on trypanosome metabolism or to inhibition of production of hydrolytic enzymes by the trypanosomes.(Clinical implications of a pharmacokinetic study in tyrosine kinase inhibitors). The tyrosine kinase inhibitors represent a new class of compounds that have been used to treat various cancers. They can induce a decrease in pharmacokinetic parameters of their target molecules and a modification of the pharmacological side-effects of these compounds. For example, an increase in the plasma concentrations of some tyrosine kinase inhibitors can induce severe cardiotoxicities, but this toxicity can be avoided by a change in the dosage regimen. In this review, we analyse the relationship between the pharmacokinetics of some tyrosine kinase inhibitors and the toxicity that they produce. We also discuss the clinical implications of measuring plasma concentrations and the doses that are necessary to maintain target molecule plasma levels within the therapeutic range.
