One-click Saving group This group is probably the most useful group for Elements users. You can choose to have Elements automatically save the image you're working on, and create thumbnails. Or, you can choose to save the image you're working on with the option you want, such as JPG/JPEG, PNG, TIFF, GIF, or BMP. Full RAW editing and plug-in support make for a huge improvement over CS, which really should be left in its dust. The interface is tightly skinned so you don't need to dive into the file structure of the software or its vast folder structure. One complaint that I have about v. 6.0 is that some of the settings don't have contextual options. A lot of the controls are set to "always off." I wish that were transferable so I could have my controls turned on or off as I wish. I'd even like to have a setting to turn on/off ALL panels as well. However, those are some of the strongest features of CS. What's more, the new workflow makes it a lot easier to start a new project and get things going again. Lightroom has always been good at utilizing the computer's CPU speed. Photoshop is no exception. Compositing acceleration is in, and this is a good thing – one of the downsides to Lightroom is its efficiency. Even if you run on lower-end hardware, the Photoshop CPU usage is mostly low. Lightroom does require roughly 2x the CPU power when using complex compositing, so if you're just running basic compositing on brand new images (like for the "looking through your camera" effect), go right ahead and run it on Medium performance. On the other hand, Lightroom takes forever to bring up the exported version of your images.
