Seattle's growing popularity as a bike-friendly city has been well documented, but a new study published this week by the National Institute of Transportation and Communities digs deeper, using 2010 Census data to investigate trends by the mode of transportation. The data shows that despite a significant population increase in Seattle over the last decade, "the number of bike trips... were about the same from 2001 to 2010," said Adam Mehler, a graduate student at Portland State University who presented the results to a community advisory group on biking last week. The study, which followed the same methodology as a 2008 Seattle Bicycle Master Plan report, tracked transportation trends among Seattle's 1.1 million residents in 2010. Mehler crunched data on about 14,000 trips and found that there was a 23 percent increase in bike trips, with the largest increase in the number of people who took trips by bike by mode. Meanwhile, bus use dropped 7 percent while transit use increased slightly, at a rate of 12 percent.
