Description: Web 2.0 is a word coined by Pierre Lassonde in an interview in Wired in 2005. Startup cost & small team? If you've been to a Maker faire, you've probably seen people making their own At the event we had a broad range of people from makers, designers, and hackers Anyone can be a maker The trick is to know what to make Making something isnt the same as making something good Some of the projects we saw were really cool But other things just seemed like overpriced gewgaws For example: these are little blocks that are supposed to attract light But they cost hundreds of dollars Most of the things we've made at the events are really tiny They take just seconds to make So they cost zero dollars to make But they take a few hundred dollars to buy the plastic So they cost about $15 This is the new way of making things It's a new economy What is one million new $? Some people say you can buy a lot of stuff with a million new $ But I dont think this is true You can buy a few moments to yourself with a million new $ You can buy some time to read this book or article youve been meaning to read But you cant buy a whole year So you can start making things with a million new $ Dont be fooled If you make a thing, you're gonna want to sell it And if you make something people want, you're gonna make a lot of money So this is the new economy The people making things and the people buying things Forget about the big guys and the small guys There's no way to win So just make things and enjoy it The more people who make things, the better it is for everyone There's no winning There's only making things and enjoying them This new economy is based on things made by people Who arent rich who arent famous Who arent powerful Who arent important Who have to be flexible To keep making things Make more things Not fewer things This is the new economy
