Advances in AI are pervasive in Adobe software. The Market Research team was told not to launch the feature-packed 2013 Photoshop CC until they could guarantee that the new features performed fast and reliably. It turns out that the ArcSoft AI engine that Adobe has built into this version has done a good job. AI moves us ever closer to a post-digital humanity, or so they say. AI is also present in the Camera RAW editor. Capture users now have the ability to have their image edit processed by an AI engine. This is something that Photoshop users have long desired. In addition, they can now decrease the number of layers, interact with their image, and apply fill and exposure adjustments. Packages and syncing is one (of many) key areas where Lightroom and Photoshop are at odds. Adobe wisely decided to use Lightroom for managing and working with images and Adobe Photoshop for making them beautiful. However, with the advent of Adobe's new CDN service, Photoshop Lightroom CC, changes in the way that images are stored, and the previously mentioned move to a cloud-based workflow, Packages can now be synced to (and from) Dropbox and Flickr, too. You can also manage local Packs now. Pretty much what you wanted. The high-end Photoshop CC Premiere Pro CS8 (now also for Mac and Linux) does something I have yet to see in other editors: Multitrack audio editing with a dynamic Realtime Viewer. This is what I called "visual control over audio" and it does it very well.

We can now start new projects from a station, which is a great way to jump into a job quickly. All changes that have been made up to that point are transferred automatically, so when starting a new project you'll have most of the tools and layers you already have open.
