I was having an issue with the apache server. I needed to remove that from my system. However, when I started the server, after the boot, it stopped and there was no login for my user. So I decided to reinstall the entire OS. This time, I went with the option of using the Ubuntu installation disk. I've used this option a lot of times, and never had a problem. This time, I did the complete installation, selecting the option of preserving the home directories. After the installation, I've tried logging in as a new user. I just can't do it. I've enabled the guest account, I've created the new user, but it's not working. I've also tried logging in using the superuser, but I can't log in using that account either. I've tried editing the file: /etc/ssh/sshd_config, but it still does not work. I've already tried restarting my computer and this did not help. I'm almost sure that the issue is with the configuration files. I'm not very familiar with them, but I think it might have something to do with the permissions of those files.

I've tried to look for solutions on the web, but I can't find any. Thanks in advance for any help. A: If you installed Ubuntu along with a pre-installed Windows (which is the default), you might have the root account disabled. To enable it, use `sudo su -`. This will bring you into the superuser mode, allowing you to enable the root account. After enabling the root account, make sure that `root@localhost` doesn't have a password.
