Today, our team is using Pixelmator Pro for all of our web design. If you haven't seen Pixelmator Pro yourself, you should spend some time demoing it. If you do, you'll immediately notice that it is almost identical to Photoshop however it is a fraction the download and also much cheaper. You can use the same workflows, you just won't need to pay. We've found that the features we need are present, they are everything we need, and the features that are not relevant to us (Sharpshooter or advanced tools such as noise reduction, or background replacement) appear to be minimal and we have found no need to turn them on. Our graphic designer can do most of the work using layers and we have found really little need to purchase the expensive paid version that we've been using. If you already work with Pixelmator Pro for your web design, you know it is a very capable tool with a unique feature set. Since it is free, I would recommend that you upgrade to it. If you don't have Pixelmator Pro right now, I would say it is useful to at least download and try it. I'm pretty sure it will work fine for what we use the program for. For the basic web template creation, we're using Resee. It is an online builder that you can use to create web templates for just about anything you want, including websites, portfolios and blog post. What's more, you're not locked into using particular features or design patterns. It has always been the strength of Photoshop that tools are well integrated and the design concepts are simple to use — knowing essential tools is generally not a problem. This simplicity of design is vital for a high end photo editor or content creator.
