Alteration of the conductivity and conformational changes in the lectin SBS II from soft tick Ornithodoros moubata under the influence of pyrrolidine carboxylic acid and pyrrolidinoacetic acid. SBS II from soft tick Ornithodoros moubata was studied by Fourier-transform infrared (FTIR) spectroscopy. The conformation of SBS II in aqueous solution and in the presence of pyrrolidine carboxylic acid (PCA) and pyrrolidinoacetic acid (PAA) was determined by the Carr-Purcell-Meiboom-Gill (CPMG) NMR relaxation experiments, and the kinetics of fluorescence and circular dichroism (CD) changes were determined by the stopped-flow and spectrofluorometer techniques. Anomalous changes in the rotational dynamics of the lectin in the presence of various concentrations of PCA and PAA were detected by the CPMG NMR. In addition, a significant decrease in the apparent fluorescence anisotropy of lectin in the presence of PCA and PAA was observed. These data indicate that PCA and PAA may directly interact with SBS II, causing a conformational change and reduction of the dynamic properties of the lectin molecule. This invention relates to a connector for electrically connecting a pair of electric wires. In an electric connector of a known type, terminal fittings are fitted into and connected to the opposite ends of a pair of electric wires, with a housing being provided between the terminal fittings. A pair of housing insertion sections are provided at front portions of the housing in parallel and opposite directions. In this connector, the terminal fittings and a pair of housing insertion sections are inserted into the housing with the terminal fittings and a pair of housing insertion sections being located at the center of the housing. A ring-shaped bending locking projection is formed on the housing at the outer circumferential direction on both the sides of the terminal fittings. The bending locking projection fits into and tightly locks the housing insertion sections so that the terminal fittings are prevented from moving forward and backward. When the terminal fittings and a pair of housing insertion sections are inserted into the housing and the terminal fittings are located at the center of the housing, the housing insertion sections and the terminal fittings remain spaced apart. Thus, the front end of a terminal fitting is located at a
