Many types of pressure-responsive door lock arrangements are known in the art. See for example, U.S. Pat. Nos. 4,176,593; 4,285,344; 4,733,596; 4,836,922 and 4,852,042. These prior art pressure-responsive arrangements have relied on certain types of pressure sensors, and in some cases, elaborate components are required to obtain a satisfactory locking function. In the U.S. Pat. No. 4,440,009 a door lock is shown with a door engaging rod supported for longitudinal movement by springs which are subject to elastic deformation, and a permanent magnet secured to a vehicle door. A magnetically responsive switch is secured to the body of the vehicle and is actuated by the magnet and door rod as the door is closed. The switch is responsive to the closing of the door and closes circuit means associated with the door lock. In the U.S. Pat. No. 4,637,493 a method of opening a door of a vehicle includes imparting a force upon the door lock releasing mechanism, sensing the force, and if the sensed force exceeds a predetermined level, forcing the lock and actuatable means releasing the lock from the closed position. Environmental enrichment increases, while restraint stress decreases, synapsin phosphorylation at Ser505 in brain regions controlling anxiety-related behaviour in adult mice. The neurosynaptic protein synapsin is involved in the formation of fast and efficient information transfer between synapses. After activation of the phosphoinositide 3-kinase (PI3K)/protein kinase B (PKB or Akt) signalling pathway, synapsin is known to be activated,

dephosphorylated at Ser
