Developmental genetics and the worm, the fly, and the mouse. During the last century, new genetic techniques were developed in the fly and the worm to understand the basis of normal development. Genetic screens in the fly have contributed to a renewed appreciation of the molecular identities of many developmental genes. The worm, with its transparency, size, and relative ease of mutagenesis, has become a new powerful model for the study of development, and is poised to yield a new understanding of the molecular basis of gene function. Here, I review recent successes and some of the long-standing challenges facing the study of development in these model organisms. Search Singer/

Maher said that even liberals are upset about a recent $2,000 bill for a Blue Cross/Blue Shield policy to their nephews and nieces, all of whom are children. Maher said that the best thing that could be done for the children would be to have them acquire their own health insurance before their parents made a mess of Obamacare. "So you know it costs, what -- $2,000?" Maher said, going on to say how the insurance is not even worth $2,000. "How come their grandfather's insurance was worth $2,000? We're already laughing about how expensive it's going to be because the best thing it could do for [the children] would be 79a2804d6b
