[2] Under this provision, foreclosure cannot occur until the mortgagee has complied with the notice requirement. Resistance of a geometric model of the myocardium to rotational energy dissipation. We consider the effect of the boundary conditions on the dynamic responses of a resistively based model of the myocardium. In particular, we examine the effect of the finite resistance between the subendocardial and subepicardial layers on the resistive profile of the heart. As previously discussed in the literature, a resistive model is often used as a good model for the dynamics of the myocardium. With the inclusion of a finite resistance between the two layers of the model, our results show that the resistance profile of the heart is not constant as previously predicted by the resistive models. We present a nonlinear model that is able to mimic the nonlinear response of the real myocardium and we analyze the effect of the resistive profile on the dynamic responses of
