Q: Is it better to use regex to find a substring that includes a hyphen or not? I am writing some tests to find a substring in a string and I'm wondering which pattern I should use. Here are the two patterns I have already written and tested: `string input_string = "red-orange-blue.oo:::"` // Case 1 `string output_string = input_string.Split('.')[1]`; // Case 2 It seems like case 2 would be faster because it doesn't split the string, but I could be wrong. The string can be anything and there will always be a '.' somewhere in there. So is it better to use regex? A: Your first strategy is better. Your second strategy will be faster if the string is always going to be.oo. If the string length will not always be.oo, the time will depend on the length of string you have to split. However, splitting on. in memory is always faster than splitting on a regex.

1835 and 1840 United States presidential election In the United States presidential election of 1836, the Whigs won a majority in the House of Representatives, and if the Whig candidate for President Henry Clay were to be elected, he would receive the largest number of electoral votes ever to be awarded to a candidate from a single party. As a result of the election, Henry Clay became president as only the fifth person to serve as president more than once without having served in the office previously. He served in this office from March 4, 1829, to March 4, 1837. This was the fifth quadrennial presidential election and was a direct election. The executive branch of the federal government was selected in an election held
