Comparative study was made of the ultrastructure of various organs and tissues in albino mice, maintained in growing conditions, which were injected with allogenic or syngenic grafts. The effects of grafts transplanted into the liver and spleen were compared. The data are indicative of a statistically significant decrease in the total number of organelles (mitochondria, endoplasmic reticula, ribosomes) and the diameter of their nuclei in the recipient mice. In their cytoplasm they reveal signs of stress. An increase in the number of mitochondria, nuclei, and the diameter of the mitochondria suggests, probably, the activation of these organelles in the grafts. Uncategorized It's pretty clear that we like Dr. Seuss. The kids and I go through Dr. Seuss books like water in the summertime, and I'm always reading them to the kid, even though it's never really
