Speed is another area where Lightroom 5 comes up short. If you import a large number of images, it can take a long time to complete the operation. If you compare import times for Lightroom 5 with that of its predecessor, you will find Lightroom 4.3 finished the task in only about half the time. Admittedly, Lightroom 5 takes longer to open the menu to get started in the Import dialog, but if you are using the Import tab (you learn how to do that by clicking on the Import button on the Photoshop main screen), the import time is reduced by half, a significant improvement. It is still an unpleasant experience for photographers, however. In any case, I think the new import dialog offers a better user experience. In this version of Lightroom, you can select a color space during the import while dragging an image into the box. (In other words, you can have the application automatically convert your image to LAB and display the resulting LAB preview.) Once you've imported your images, you can go back and re-edit the colors and other aspects of the photo. There is also a fast and convenient file browser, but you can't export images directly at this time, so you will first have to dump them into your hard disk files. Lightroom 4 usually is able to get images out of camera in less than one minute. If you use a laptop that lacks a CD drive, you can use Lightroom to dump images into a USB thumb drive, which can be saved as a JPEG and has unlimited storage space. A digital camera can dump the data to a USB card reader. After your import is complete, Lightroom's Preview window displays thumbnails of the images in the catalog. You don't have to launch the application to check the quality of your images, because each thumbnail image will show you a preview of the image.

Nick has been behind some of the greatest visual effects in cinema history. In the past, his work with long form photographic images was often featured in stop motion films. He says that to pull off a shot like one pictured below, he would render the moving image for hours, slow the motion to match the effect, and then hand animate the cut. That's so hot to make now. You don't have to do everything in photoshop. You can do the motion stuff on After Effects, [or] the compositing on Flame with a pan and zoom feature, and then render it out, say, to a
