I don't see how it matters what CC you use whether you save to a named PSD or not. Unless you load the PSD in Elements 11.5 and use the "convert to PSD's" from the image menu in Elements 11.5 and then use the MPD's feature in Elements 11.5 of course you can't do that. After long periods of work, mostly in a low key "guard" mentality, I will release my own personal review of the software I use, for sake of public scrutiny and to see if there are any glaring errors I might make. Anyhow, for the benefit of those less inclined to bear with my tortured thoughts, I remind you that I am neither objective nor impartial. The good news is that Adobe has included a basic "What's New" screen with each update that lets you know all of the new features in that particular version of the software and that you can examine a particular aspect to see if you may wish to change it towards the way the software developers intended. I noticed that Adobe wants you to more or less use Lightroom as a robust photographic processing software and they have included a total of just one screen to let you know the software can do so much more. I will expand on this remark later on in this article. I only wish Adobe had included more of this "What's New" info on their main photo website instead of only on the separate section on the Adobe's website. This piece of information could also be put in the "Enterprise" section I believe. This could be a really powerful piece of information to make a buyer or a software company or individual aware of the many backward-compatible features for many years to come. However, I digress.
