With every new version of Photoshop, I'm amazed at how much better it is. I've used Photoshop since it was CS2, and it was a beast of an application. Photoshop CC makes it better. Best of all, it's finally free. » Although their name suggests it, LightRoom is not a substitute for Photoshop, but an additional tool for users who find themselves unable to make the switch. The user interface of LightRoom is relatively simple, though slightly more complex than that of Photoshop. While working in either program, you will quickly understand that LightRoom needs certain features to perform, and Photoshop has them. LightRoom for example, can do basic retouching and it is a nice tool for reducing the file size of JPEG portraiture. LightRoom allows you to add labels to images, and uses such data for the names of the thumbnails. Other notable new features are color-correcting tools that can undo over- or underexposure and correct color balance. The Lens Correction tool in Lightroom 5 now provides a much better solution for sharpening photos. Lightroom 5 allows you to remove red eye from photos. While it was a little shaky at first, with the help of the new tool Auto Sharpening, it was very reliable. You can also remove dust and dirt and repair shadows and highlights. I would like to see a better, smart label search tool for the palette. So for the first time (in many LightRoom versions), I did not need a catalog to import a large quantity of photographs. Unfortunately, the label search tool was not really working right; it was only somewhat faster in searching the labels in a catalog than the tool did on the images themselves. A better view would also allow you to choose a search depth. The first result also appears at the wrong depth. It would also be favorable if the imported photographs automatically sorted into your catalog so that a clever search could quickly find them.
