Let's start with the fact that most photo editing programs have trouble alternating between layers. To make something face the other way, select the edit on the layer below, put face on top, then piece together the elements inside the partially occluded box. That process takes so long partly because there's so much information to work with (the box is chosen, which parts are covered and not covered) and partly because the intersection of the two boxes has to be calculated. This is one of the simplest ways to make polygonal shapes work, but it's very fiddly. Why doesn't Photoshop have a way to split a rectangle into two separate boxes that face different directions? Similarly, I wish there was a quicker way to make the edges connected to the faces of the separate rectangles. Because Photoshop makes you work at your own pace, it's best to have an organized workspace. I have two monitors, so I normally set both up with the image I'm working on positioned sharply on one monitor. On the other, I place a blank document. I then drag document files next to one another for greater access. If you leave the multi-document display blank, Photoshop will store recent images on the side of it. You can hit Ctrl-M to bring it up, but I hate the way the corners overlap. Usually, if you have room you can have both monitors on one side or both on the other. If you're using the option to preview on the canvas, you can view the file you're about to open, another file or document being used, and previews of the layers (objects on the canvases you chose, and the layer thumbnails). I prefer the tabbed display. In a tabbed display, you view all your documents at once. You can select an object in one document, immediately view it in another document on the same screen. You can size the tabbed display so that the documents and previews are ideal for the monitor; I use two vertical spaces, so one document and its layers sit above a document and its layers. My display looks like this:
