The AI functionality of the program is fairly limited in some cases, and there are some errors that the AI makes in its interpretation of image information. For example, a highlighted shadowed area on a photo shows a transparency warning that's in roughly the same location as other warnings (such as "Missing file fragments that are required for file creation"). It's a stretch to call this as a "Missing shadow" warning, since there might be a portion of the shadow that isn't included in the image, but the overlay of the shadow is included. It's possible to critique every feature of this program, but there are a few things that are worth highlighting. While not final, the software was able to handle most things I threw at it without a problem. One thing to be aware of is this review is more for a seasoned advanced Photoshop user than for a beginner. Adobe has included some helpful libraries for people who want to create their own work, including things like the Custom Camera,

Photo Filter, Animated Gifs, Slideshow and Timelapse. It's even possible to create custom web pages that use elements from these hand-drawn libraries. If you can think of an application of these features in a simpler way than the standard options, Adobe will likely include it. Dealing with the RAW images is made easier by the ability to label new folders, though the process is still somewhat manual, as there's no easy way to batch rename the files. Saving new images, or even the default name, can be problematic since many may not be able to be used.

We've worked hard to make the workflow as consistent and predictable as possible, and expect this will be a case for most users. In order to do this, we're developing a new image management system called Image Automation that will unify the workflow for the entire Adobe suite. While this is still in development, it's going to be a rich, new image management system that's not limited to the linear workflow of Photoshop. While we're developing Image Automation, we're also looking to modernize your experience with existing workflow controls like layers and plugins. In the process, we're also going to continue to develop the next version of Photoshop. It will include incredible new features, including a set of new tools that will appeal to both designers and artists. This effort will also continue to bridge the gap between the creative and design worlds. In the end, this will help usher in a new set of workflow tools and system that will allow you to take your projects to new heights. The Adobe Design Team is already working on this next version of Photoshop, and you can see the new tools as we showcase them. We feel this will be a true new and improved Photoshop for all our users. But what about you, the reader? What are you most looking forward to? Which workflow controls and features would you want to see? Share your thoughts and ideas with us in the comments! For me, particularly working in the video news space, being able to use multiple retouching applications side by side is a huge advantage. When you use more than a couple of applications, that's when the features start to interfere with one another. I can draw something unique in Photoshop or Painter, update the same layer in Lightroom or Capture one, and you can notice changes when you edit a layer in Photoshop. To me, that's a

Better yet, fill use is on by default, and it's applied even to objects that are hidden from view.
